Dear Liddia,

I am writing after hearing the "Business Telegraph" program where the issue of using non pasteurized products was raised again.

I believe I have a personal experience which could be raised as an illustration as to why using non pasteurized products have more than the obvious problems, which are immediate like death and illness. Personally, because of the problems I have seen, heard of from the past and my own illness, I want it not to be introduced.

Also from a marketing point of view I can see that the strict guidelines are protective overall, that they have relevance to the marketing message. We being situated as an Island and all are uniquely able to use these to mitigate the market distance disadvantage. I am speaking as a non producer, just as an observer.

The problems related to bananas and oranges and the Equine Flu make me think; it would be misplaced importance to allow the introduction and production of the products for the sake of a few and for taste or fashion reasons.

I haven't elaborated on my main reason for objection, the medical reasons. However if you are interested to follow up my note, I can be reached at the above phone number. The best time being before 10am - but at any time is also an option much of the time

I thank you for your input both on the radio and as part of the team setting a standard, which includes such vital needs as health

Sincerely
Maui Nicholas.
